Editorial Note: The opinions expressed herein are those of the author alone, not those of any bank, credit card issuer, airline or hotel chain, and have not been reviewed, approved or endorsed by any of these entities. Katherine Song's © The Balance 2020 is one of the transactions you can make on your credit card is a cash advance. Taking a credit card cash advance is kind of like withdrawing cash from an ATM using your debit card, just with a credit card cash advance, you borrow cash from your credit limit, not from your verification account. When you take an advance on your credit card, you have to pay the money just as you do with the purchases you make on your credit card. They will make money from the transaction, by charging cash advance fees each time you receive a cash advance against your credit limit. This is higher than the interest collected from the day the cash advance is made; the exact amount of your cash advance fee depends on the amount of your advance and the way the credit card issuer calculates the fees. Most credit card issuers charge a fixed fee or percentage of the amount of the cash advance, whichever is greater. For example, a typical cash advance fee is greater than $10 or 5%. So, if you take a cash advance of $100 under these terms, your cash advance fee will be $10 since 5% of $100 is only $5. On the other hand, if you take a cash advance of $500, your cash advance fee will be $25. These are transactions that are treated like a cash advance even though you did not take cash from ATMs. For example, cash advance fees will also be charged if you use your credit card as overdraft protection, purchase a financial order, put money on a reloadable gift card, buy lottery tickets, or send money to someone else. Cash equivalent transaction fees may differ from regular cash advance fees. If you have questions about your cash advance fee, contact your credit card customer service department by calling the number on the back of your account Card. Know how fees are calculated before you take a cash advance so you are not caught by surprise. The only way to avoid cash advance fees is by avoiding cash advances and cash-equivalent transactions on your credit card. If you can't avoid the transaction in full, you can reduce your cash advance fee by reducing the amount of cash you withdraw on your credit card. As interest begins to accumulate immediately on the cash advance, paying your cash advance quickly will reduce the total cost of progress. There is no shortage of credit cards that offer attractive rewards. But many of them come at a price - an annual fee. However, if you want to maximize and allocate rewards without these expenses, the Us Bank's Visa Signature card may be the one that will be offered to you.
